As long as entertainments of such a low order continue to be shown in our neighborhood we will continue to object, and we have a right to be heard. Recently it was called to my attenion that our townspeople are this year more conservative in their purchasing of tickets for the course, but many are saying that they intend to buy single tickets. Today, after three years of abuse and continuous commendation on the other, the dry laws, although showing the effects of being the brunt of many attacks, still stand as the law of the land, and the majority of the people, whether or not they are in armpathy with the shollion of strong beverages, have become recontleted to some extent, and stand for the efforcement of the law as long as it remains on the book.

Up to a short time previous to July 1, 1916, the people of the country smiled at the efforts of the Anti-Salcon league or other reform organizations to have the liquor prohibition law written in the federal constitution. The idea of hanning liquor was abourd, they said. Such a thing would be impossible. If even an attempt was made to prohibit liquor it was an unter failure. The manners of the people would rise in protest and force the return of alcoholic beverages. Such remarks were common. They were to be heard on the street corners, in public halls and, in fact, everywhere one went.
